The prompt verdict of the jury in the Briane Courier case will serve as a protection to the liberty of the press in Queensland. The JUDGES told the jury that while they were there to check the abuse of that liberty—a liberty recognised in express terms by the statute law—they were to preserve its freedom," and see that it suffered no diminution at their hands." It would have suffered a diminution had the object of the prosecution been attained. There have been a few such cases in England; their number is said to be three; but they uniformly failed. There was once before such a case in Queensland; but that failed also. Recently a somewhat similar case was begun in the Supreme Court of South Australia, but it was not carried through. Had there been a verdict against Mr. Hux in this case, that would have been the end.

in this case, the freedom of public criticism upon the conduct of members of Parliament would have been seriously narrowed down, because thenceforth it would have been clearly unsafe for any writer to comment, except in the most cautiously guarded terms, upon the proceedings of the men who, protected by privilege, are free to slander every member of the community. If juries were willing to minimise the liberty of the press, any dominant party in the Queensland Assembly could order the prosecution of

An offending critic, and so practically suppress effective criticism. It is well that the jury in this case took a broader view of the limits of permissible comment, and so followed in the line of the old safe precedents, instead of setting a new and a bad one.

An the case against Mr. HILL was a criminal prosecution, and not a civil action, a conviction would have been the means of inflicting a punishment very different in character from that which follows a mere verdict for damages with its accompanying of costs. But, on the other hand, a prosecution to be successful must be supported by stronger evidence than is required to uphold the claim in a civil suit. Mr. HILL was not to be convicted by the balancing of a straw. He was entitled to the benefit of any bona-fide doubt. The form of procedure, therefore, whilst it exposed the accused to greater risk, accorded him also an important advantage. No jury could in this case have said that beyond all doubt a false and scandalous libel had been committed, without reducing materially the fair liberty of public criticism on the conduct of public men.

Mr. Justice HARDING warned the jury against being "too much imbued by the struggle—the unusual struggle—made in this case to obtain a verdict at their hands." But the fact is that in almost all such cases there must appear to be something in the nature of a struggle—the bringing to bear of extraordinarily influence against the accused. The proceedings are begun in Parliament. The House, or a majority, orders the Attorney-General to prosecute. The Attorney-General prosecutes under orders, and not, as in ordinary cases, because he sees that there is a prima facie case. If he conducts the proceedings in the most moderate way, then will still appear to be an element of force in the transaction. In this case the ATTORNEY-GENERAL used some pressure. He appealed to the feelings of the jury by reminding them that their action also might be criticised. Mr. Justice HARDING suggested that this might be a threat of criticism in the Assembly if they should acquit the defendant. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL referred to possible newspaper criticism. But admitting so much, the argument was not a fair one. It was inviting the jury to deal adversely with the crime because their own turn might come next. The JUDGE did well to point out that this was

The most important part of the charge was that in which his Honor asked the jury to say whether the matter, if found defamatory, was published on a privileged occasion, whereby the presumption of malice would be rebutted. He pointed out that fair comments on the public exercise of public functions by public men were allowed, and then proceeded thus:—"Now, a fair comment was a comment which was either true, or which if false, expressed the real opinion of its author (as to the existence of matter of fact or otherwise), such opinion having been formed with a reasonable degree of care and on reasonable grounds. The jury would consider whether the comment was fair—whether it was true, or, if false, whether it expressed the opinion of the writer, and whether such opinion had been formed with a reasonable degree of care and on reasonable grounds. If they thought it had, they would find that the publication was privileged." Of course, it is to be observed that in this case there was no plea of justification, and no witness was called for the defence. But, at the same time, this declaration of the law is to be recognised as a broad one, and as one that fairly covers, though it does not exceed, the requirements of the case. Liberty of comment is a very poor liberty indeed, if the exercise of reasonable care and the existence of reasonable grounds, are not allowed to protect honest criticisms on the public conduct of any person.

If it were not that the Committee of Elections and Qualifications, to whose action the Courier's article referred, may be regarded as a judicial tribunal, it might be thought that Mr. Justice HARDING were out of his wits when he talked about libelling a Judge. He said "it was highly libellous to charge a Judge with partiality or corruption, or anything of that nature. You might criticise his acts, but not his judgments. In fact, the only criticism that is allowable is that of judges desired that they should be criticized. It brought to light any mistakes they might have made, and sharpened the future administration of justice. But the law did not allow improper motives to be imputed to them." There is nothing new in this. The doctrine has been laid down often enough before by the functionaries who are specially protected by it. And further, as the law has thus been laid down by them, other people are hardly in a position to tion to challenge it. But when the reason for the thing is inquired into, how is the drawing of this sharp line of distinction to be justified? The mistakes of a Judge may be rectified by appeals; but what if he lack integrity and impartiality? If it be for the public good that incapacity should be exposed, is it not of far greater moment that when corruption exists there should be a full exposure of it? Of course the man who charges a Judge with corruption should hold himself out as a Judge with corruption select evidence in in readiness to bring satisfactory support of his charge. But corruption in respecting the Anglican Cathedral now being built in Swanston-street, is at an end. A large parcel of plans has arrived from England from Mr. Butterfield's office, and the work, which for some time has been suspended owing to the misunderstanding, will at once be resumed.

A large audience assembled at Trinity College this evening to witness the first of three representations of a Latin play by the students of the College. The play selected is the "Ludens" of Plautus, and the more cultivated portion of the metropolis have taken a great interest in the performance. Three years ago the students of the same institution rendered Plautus' "Mostellaria" or "The Haunted House."

At the Central Criminal Court to-day George Halton, charged with the murder of his wife at Lauriston, was brought up, and a jury empanelled to try whether he was in a condition to plead. Two medical men gave evidence in the case, and the jury found him of unsound mind. Justice Higginbotham thereupon remanded him to await the Governor's pleasure.

THE A. J. C. AUTUMN MEETING.

THE CUP DAY.

In length, and breadth, and depth, fullness, completeness, and all that goes to the making of a great holiday, Cup Day in Sydney can be no more compared with Cup Day in Melbourne than Port Jackson with Port Phillip, or the Goodwood enclosure with the Epsom Downs.

It is not a universal fact, as is often stated, that the Cup Day is not a national pastime, if the silks and the silks find any favour at the court, the public opinion, then the public should assemble by their leaders and representatives, if not by their families and clans. The Governor should be there, and the Governor's apartment should be decorated for his reception; there should be roses and of violets, colour of purple and crimson, rustling of silk and satin, a flourish of trumpets at the formal entry, and an uprising of all things gorgeous and beautiful glowing around the State box.

The heads of the various interests should be present; the little sporting element conspicuous in every crowd should not be absent; the blackguards, as at every carnival of sport, should put up its chin.

How was it yesterday in all these various aspects? Was the Governor there? Nay, but his empty box. Was fashion there? Nay; save one or two rare blades of sabres and silk, and cunningly wrought red upon rich brown, fashion was conspicuous by its absence.

Was the court down, the princess and chiefs of squatters at the formal entry, and an uprising of all things gorgeous and beautiful glowing around the State box. The heads of the various interests should be present; the little sporting element conspicuous in every crowd should not be absent; the blackguards, as at every carnival of sport, should put up its chin.

How was it yesterday in all these various aspects? Was the Governor there? Nay, but his empty box. Was fashion there? Nay; save one or two rare blades of sabres and silk, and cunningly wrought red upon rich brown, fashion was conspicuous by its absence.

Was the court down, the princess and chiefs of squatters at the formal entry, and an uprising of all things gorgeous and beautiful glowing around the State box. The heads of the various interests should be present; the little sporting element conspicuous in every crowd should not be absent; the blackguards, as at every carnival of sport, should put up its chin.

but little comment here. When the field had covered less than half the distance, the horses were tired, and the crowd rolled over. The pace of the time was very slow, and the fall was a desperate one. Power, the Victorian jockey, who rode "the pride of the stable," had his collarbone broken; and Hales, who piloted Morphet, was so severely shaken that he could not rise for some time, while Morphet had his leg stepped in two places, and had to be shot. The accident is greatly to be regretted, for brilliant racing was the result of the day.
